Specifics for Neuropsych:

I will ask each participant to provide a short biography about their interests and experiences, which I will distribute to everyone. That way you can find out what interests you have in common, and maybe someone will know the answer to something that has been niggling you for a while.

Everybody is requested to conduct a presentation on a topic of interest to them. It does not have to be research (like a conference) but more a clinical issue that you have been thinking/reading about – and can share with the group.

Some types of topics might be –

- I've had a run of XXX patients, and didn't know much about that condition – this is what I learned
- How can I better assess condition XXX – this is what the literature suggests
- Is there a better way to understand problem XXX
- How can I improve the efficiency of my practise in area XXX
- I saw this (test/procedure/form/questionnaire) in the literature and introduced it – this is how it helped me

So, it's a bit more like a journal club and professional discussion with a wealth of relevant experience in the room. Usually people are kind and generous - and it is such a relief to realise that we all encounter the same types of practical issues, and are all searching for the best ways to deal with them. Depending on numbers we may also get to present cases to each other too.

Depending on the group, there might be quite vigorous discussion! Others may have come up with different solutions, and we can all benefit. Sometimes the issues are not just our individual concerns, but bigger issues for the profession.

Who attends?

People who love neuropsychology – and want to combine a break from the routine with getting peer supervision from a great group of people. We usually rack up many hours of peer supervision (over meals etc) talking about our favourite topics!

Often people in private practise are attracted to this type of thing, as it is a way to really nut out complex issues, with others who are in the same boat. That being said, I welcome all neuropsychologists – everyone has something to offer.

PD Points:

You will need to self-assess, but a lot of the time our discussions will be point-worthy! We often separate into smaller groups, and maybe go for a walk (massage/etc) and get some peer supervision points with individual discussions about issues that are on our mind. The wonderful thing is that there is usually a great variety of people and experiences available.
